“Soft City showcases an approach to building cities that prioritizes fundamental human needs like light, air, and connection to place and community – principles that should not only be recognized in times of crisis.”

The summary table below provides the overall results which combine tax levy and rate-supported services. The values shown in the table represent a comparison to the existing City-wide average. Development in the higher-density urban category produces a surplus of $590/capita when levy and rate services are combined. Development in the lower-density urban greenfield category has a negative variance of $269/capita while the low-density village

Downtown's raw deal: what to do?

David Reevely

February 4, 2009 • 2 minute read

Lots of good backtalk on yesterday's post about downtown's raw deal.

First of all, here's the study \(PDF\) showing that downtown residents pay about $1,000 more per household in property taxes than they get back in services, while suburban and rural residents get more than they pay for.
